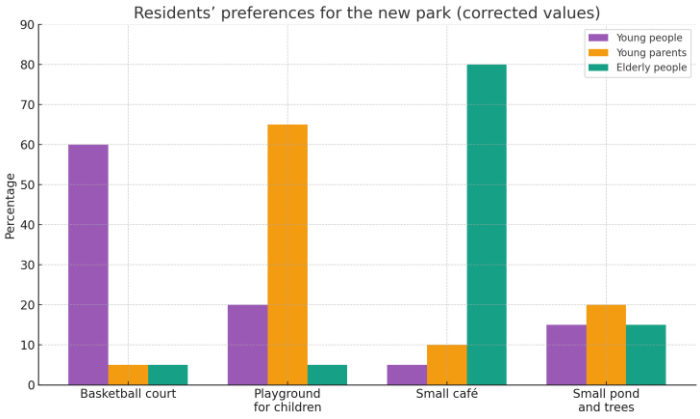
Report:
Residents' Preferences for the New Park



Introduction

This report outlines the results of a survey about which facilities residents would like to see in a new public park and provides recommendations for improving living conditions in the area. The survey was conducted among three age groups: young people, young parents, and elderly people, who were given four options to choose from: a basketball court, a playground for children, a small café, and a small pond with trees.

Survey Results

The results reveal differences between the age groups. The majority of elderly people, almost four-fifths, would prefer a small café. Nearly two-thirds of young parents chose a playground for children, and almost the same number of young people showed a preference for a basketball court. None of the respondents were enthusiastic about a small pond with trees. Only one in seven young people and elderly people, and one in five young parents, voted for that option.

Explanation of the results

The reasons behind the choices can be easily explained. They show that different age groups have different needs. Most young people choose a basketball court because they prefer sports-related facilities, whereas young parents naturally prefer child-friendly spaces. Elderly residents, on the other hand, who are not keen on doing sports and usually visit the park alone, would appreciate a quiet place where they could enjoy a cup of coffee and relax.

Recommendations and suggestions

Based on the findings, my recommendation is to build one or all of these facilities: a basketball court, a playground for children or a small café in the park, and to abandon the idea of building a pond. These recreational amenities would create a welcoming space for both young and elderly people, encouraging social interactions within the community.
